Gr. $\rho\alpha\rho\iota\sigma\iota\varsigma$, $\delta\iota\alpha\pi\alpha\rho\iota\sigma\iota\varsigma$. Lat., respiratio from respirare, to breathe. Fr. r. Ger. R. Athmen, Athmung, Athem. 1. The mechanical processes of inspiration and expiration of air, or of supplying water to the gills, etc. 2. One complete inspiration followed by a complete expiration. 3. The taking up of oxygen and the giving off of carbon dioxide by the tissues of animals or plants; that part of the nutrient process which has to do with nutriment and waste in the gaseous form. 4. The assumption of oxygen by the blood in the lungs, gills, etc., and the rejection of carbon dioxide, watery vapor, and traces of organic matter at the same time and by the same organs (see External r.). 5. Of less recent writers, the taking up of carbon dioxide and the rejection of oxygen by the green parts of plants in sunlight; shown by Draper (1844) to be comparable to digestion, but not to. Physiologists are now agreed that the r. of plants is identical with that of animals, and the term is used collectively for the processes of absorption of oxygen by plants, oxidation of the oxidizable organic matter (carbohydrates) in their tissues, and evolution of the products (carbonic acid and water) of such oxidation. [B. 229, 231 (a, 35); J. 40.]—Abdominal r. Fr. r. abdominale (ou ventrale). Ger. Abdominalathmen, Bauchathmen. R. (1st def.) due principally to the contraction of the diaphragm and the elasticity of the abdominal walls and viscera; said to be common in adult men, the horse, the cat, and the rabbit. [J. 14, 40.]—Aerial r. Fr. r. aérienne. Ger. Luftathmung. R. of air, in which the respiratory membrane of the lungs, trachea, etc., is supplied with oxygen and relieved of carbon dioxide by means of atmospheric air. In the lower forms of air-breathing animals, aerial r. is combined with aquatic r., as in frogs, or the animal may exercise either aerial or aquatic r. as inclination or necessity demands, like frogs in winter and some pulmonate gastropods. [J. 5, 11.]—Aquatic r. Ger. Wasserathmung. R. in water, i. e., r. in which the respiratory membrane, branchial mucosa (gills), skin, etc., are supplied with oxygen and relieved of carbon dioxide by means of water. [J. Cf. Aerial r.]—Artificial r. Ger. künstliche Athmung. 1. Imitation of the natural movements of r., as by alternately drawing the arms up over the head and pressing them against the sides of the chest, thus in turn enlarging the thoracic cavity by elevating the ribs and diminishing it by depressing them, as in Sylvester's method of resuscitating asphyxiated persons. The expiration may be made more complete by pressing the abdominal wall toward the thorax at the same time that the chest is compressed. [J.] Hall's method (the so-called "ready method") of treating asphyxia consists in laying the person on the face, to allow liquids to run out from the air-passages, then turning him on one side, so as to allow of the expansion of the walls of the chest from the weight of the body having been removed from the breast. These movements are repeated fifteen times to the minute, and warm applications are made. Howard's method is by the direct application of compression to the ribs by the hands of the operator, who kneels over the patient, slowly brings his weight to bear upon the chest, compressing the ribs and costal cartilages, and then suddenly removes the pressure, allowing the thorax to expand by its own elasticity. [E.] 2. See Forced r.—Blood-r. Ger. Blutathmung. See External r.—Blowing r. See Branchial r.—Branchial r. Ger. Kiemenathmung. R. by means of gills or branchiae, as in aquatic animals. [J.]—Branchial r. Fr. souffle bronchique, bruit des bronches. Ger. Bronchialathmen, Bronchialgeräusch. 1. The sound produced by the rush of the air from the larynx into the pharynx or the reverse; most marked in expiration. 2. A somewhat similar sound may be heard over the bronchial tubes. [J. 40.] 2. A form of r. which displaces vesicular r. in certain diseases of the lungs. In inspiration it is tubal, short in duration, incomplete, and of high pitch. Expiration is as long as inspiration or longer, of greater intensity, and of higher pitch. It indicates condensed lung tissue, as in pneumonia, pleurisy with effusion, etc. [D. 1.] See also BRONCHIAL MURMUR.—Broncho-vesicular r. Of Flint, r. which shows less of the vesicular character than the healthy respiratory murmur, less softness, higher pitch, and more of a blowing and less of an equal character. The inspiratory portion is short in duration, elevated in pitch, and variable in intensity. The expiratory portion is either absent or, if present, prolonged, higher in pitch, and often of greater intensity than the inspiratory portion, which it follows after an appreciable interval. It indicates pulmonary condensation, and may occur in phthisis, pneumonia, cancer, oedema, etc. [D. 1.]—Buccal r. See Mouth-breathing.—Cavernous r. R. accompanied by a sound like that produced by blowing into a cavity. An abnormal state of the r. observed when death is impending, and in certain diseases, especially of the brain, first carefully investigated by Cheyne and Stokes. The respiratory movements gradually decrease in extent and rapidly, finally ceasing entirely for several seconds, then begin again and gradually increase until the normal condition is regained or exceeded. [J. 19.]—Clavicular r. A form of r. practised by singers in which the clavicle takes part in the respiratory movement, the shoulders being elevated. ["Rev. de laryng. et d'otol.," May 15, 1892, p. 292 (a, 50).] Cf. Costo-superior r.—Cogged-wheel r. See Interrupted r.—Costal r. Ger., Costalathmen, Rippenr. R. (1st def.) due chiefly to the elevation and depression of the ribs, especially the upper ones, the diaphragm taking a comparatively small part; seen especially in women and supposed by most physiologists to have reference to gestation, although some attribute it to the mode of dress. [J. 8, 19, 28, 40, 41.]—Costo-inferior r. Of Beau and Maissiat, r. (1st def.) produced mainly by the elevation and depression of the lower ribs; said to be especially well seen in dogs. [J. 18, 28, 45.]—Costo-superior r. Of Beau and Maissiat, a form of respiratory movement produced mainly by the elevation and depression of the upper ribs; most common in women. [J. 55.]—Divided r. [Walsh]. That form of r. in which there is a distinct interval between the murmur of inspiration and that of expiration; due to dilatation of the air-cells (as in emphysema), by which the expulsion of the air is hindered. [J.]—Exaggerated r. R. which differs from normal r. only in showing greater intensity. It may, however, become a sign of disease, in which case the excess of intensity is in expiration; in health it is in inspiration. [Walsh and Fournet (D. 11).]—External r. Ger., äussere Athmung, Blutathmung. The assumption of oxygen and rejection of carbon dioxide carried on by the blood in its passage through the lungs, branchiae, or other respiratory membranes. The oxygen is conveyed by the blood to the entire body, and while in the capillaries the blood gives up its oxygen to the tissues and receives carbon dioxide in return. So far as general r. is concerned, the blood acts simply as a carrier of oxygen and carbon dioxide for the tissues. Considered as a tissue, however, the blood respire like other tissues. [J.] See Tissue r.—Extrinsic r. Of F. Hewitt, the inspiration and immediate expiration of a gas (e.g., nitrous oxide) into the surrounding air, so that a portion that has once been inspired is not inspired again. ["Med. Chron.," Feb., 1886, p. 363.]—Facial r. Ger., Gesichtathmung. All the movements of the face dependent upon r., especially the dilatation of the nostrils during inspiration and their collapse during expiration. [D. 47.]—Fetal r. See Placental r.—Forced r. R. supported by blowing air into the lungs with bellows, or in some other way, as in physiological experiments. The nozzle of the bellows is usually connected with the trachea by means of a tube. By using two Y tubes, one of them communicating in some part of its length with a chamber for ether, chloroform, etc., either pure air or air mixed with the anesthetic may be made to pass into the lungs. [J.]—Harsh r. See Broncho-vesicular r.—Hissing r. An increase of the vesicular murmur producing a hissing sound. [a, 34.]—Hollow r. See Amphoric murmur (1st def.).—Indirect r. R. in which the living matter is usually in quite large masses, as in the higher animals, and the oxygen is supplied by a respiratory blood, which also removes the carbon dioxide. In this form of r. the respiratory blood is in turn supplied with oxygen and relieved of carbon dioxide by special respiratory organs (lungs or gills). [J. 55.]—Inner r. Internal r. See Tissue r.—Interrupted r. Fr., r. saccadée, r. entrecoupée. R. in which the respiratory murmur is interrupted; supposed to be caused by incomplete dilatation of the air-cells and oftenest found at the anterior surface of the apex of the right lung. In inspiration the glottis is wide open, allowing the freest entrance of the air, while in expiration it is narrowed and somewhat retards the air's exit. [J. 19.]—Lung r. See Pulmonary r.—Metamorphosis r. Metamorphosing r. Of Seltz, a respiratory sound that begins like that of stenosis, distinctly bronchial, and suddenly changes to a weak bronchial breathing that is also heard during expiration; very rare and said to be a certain sign of a cavity. [Vierordt (a, 34).]—Muscle-r. Ger. Muskelathmung. R. (3d def.) by a muscle when in action. [K.]—Nasal r. R. (1st def.) through the nose. [J.]—Nervous r. Of Corrigan, that form of r. in fevers (especially in typhus) in which the lips are closed, the cheeks are distended, the nostrils dilate with each expiration, the breathing is irregular, and there is a

In man and the higher animals generally the tissues obtain their oxygen from the blood in the capillaries, and give their carbon dioxide up to it in return, the capillary walls acting as a respiratory membrane to the tissues. In insects the air is conveyed to the tissues by the tracheae, and the tissues respire the oxygen of the air directly, instead of from the blood as in man, etc., the walls of the tracheae acting as a respiratory membrane. In unicellular organisms (Protozoa) the general surface of the body acts as a respiratory membrane, and the protoplasm respire the oxygen dissolved in the surrounding water directly. Fr., rhubarbe de Chine, or de Moscovie, or de Perse [Fr. Cod.]. Gr., Rhabarbar, Rhabarberwurzel. Sp., rubarbo (rizoma ó tallo aéreo) [Sp. Ph.]. 1. Of the U. S. Ph., the root of Rheum officinale and other underground species of Rheum; of the Br. Ph., the sliced and dried root of "Rheum palmatum, Rheum officinale, and probably other species, collected and prepared in China and Tibet." The botanical source of the commercial drug (see Chinese r.) has not been definitely ascertained, the various species supposed to yield it producing under cultivation in Europe roots lacking some of the characteristics of the Chinese drug. The differences, however, may be due to climate. r. root contains chrysophan, rheotannic acid, emodin, a neutral substance, $C_{14}H_{10}O_6$, forming colorless crystals, several resins (see APORRHETIN and ERYTHRORRHETIN), an albuminoid principle insoluble in alcohol but soluble in water, mucilage (11 to 17 per cent.), extractive, tannic and gallic acids, sugar, starch, pectin, lignin, calcium oxalate, and various inorganic salts. All varieties of r. root have the properties, though in a lesser degree of the Chinese drug. r. is purgative and cholagogue, and in small doses (from 5 to 10 grains) a mild laxative and stomachic tonic. It is useful in dyspepsia, attended with constipation or with deficient biliary and intestinal secretions, in cholera infantum, and in chronic dysentery, and is of special value in duodenal catarrh or catarrh of the biliary ducts with jaundice and in certain skin diseases. It is also applied in powder to indolent and sloughing ulcers. It is most effectual in substance, though the fluid extract, infusion, syrup, and tincture are also used, being combined with soap in cases in which it is necessary to counteract its astringency. 2. The genus Rheum. The pieces are of a less bright color than the Russian drug, and are pierced through with perforations, which are often concealed, however, by being filled with the powdered root. [B. 5 (a, 35).]—Bucharian r. 1. The Rheum undulatum; so called because formerly believed to furnish Russian r. 2. Russian r. 3. The Chinese r. of the Russians; an inferior variety of r.-root imported into Russia from Tartary. [B. 180 (a, 35).]—Canton r., China r., Chinese r. Lat., rheum sinense (seu indicum). Fr., rhubarbe de Chine [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., chinesischer (oder dinischer, oder holländischer, oder ostindischer, oder tatarischer) Rhabarber. Sp., rubarbo de China [Mex. Ph.]. R.-root as now known to commerce. It occurs in cylindrical, or barrel-shaped, or plano-convex, or conical, or irregular-shaped pieces, of a peculiar aromatic odor and a bitter, astringent taste; they average about 3 or 4 inches in length and 2 to 3 inches in width, and are usually sorted as round and flat r. The pieces are somewhat shriveled on the surface, and are pierced with holes in which may be found portions of a string used to suspend the root when drying. The drug when well developed is flattened, if broken transversely, lined (medullary rays) arranged as an internal ring of stellate spots. When powdered, it is yellow, having a tinge of reddish-brown. It has a gritty taste when chewed, and turns the saliva yellow. There are two varieties of China r., one, believed to be produced by the Rheum palmatum, having a red-grained fracture with white lattice-work veins, and the other, referred to Rheum officinale, a black-grained fracture with white veins ramifying longitudinally. For chemical composition and medicinal properties, see under R. [B. 5, 180 (a, 35).]—Compound tincture of r. See Tinctura rhei amaræ.—Crown r. See Russian r.—Decoction of r. See Infusum rhei.—Dutch r. Lat., radix rhei hollandici. The taste is more mucilaginous and astringent and less bitter than that of Chinese r., and the texture more spongy and soft. [B. 5 (a, 35).]—European r. Sp., rapontico [Mex. Ph.]. Produced in France from Rheum rhaponticum, Rheum undulatum, Rheum compactum, and Rheum palmatum. The last-named species, according to Guibourt, affords a root more closely resembling the Chinese drug, but it has been least cultivated, owing to the liability of the central root to premature decay. Except in the vicinity of Arignon and in a few other places, the cultivation of r. in France has been abandoned. [B. 180 (a, 35).]—Garden r. The Rheum rhaponticum, Rheum palmatum, Rheum undulatum, or hybrids of these, cultivated for their edible leaf stalks. [B. 5 (a, 35).]—German r. R.-root produced at Austerlitz and Auspitz in Moravia, from Rheum compactum and, according to Hanbury, Rheum rhaponticum; at Ilimitz, Krennitz, and Frauenkirchen in Hungary from Rheum rhaponticum; and in Silesia from Rheum australe. Moravian r. is said to be nearly equal, medicinally, to Chinese r. [B. 18 (a, 35).]—Himalaya r. A variety produced by Rheum australe, Rheum spiciforme, Rheum moorcroftianum, etc.; said to be nearly equal to Russian r. as a purgative, and superior as an astringent and tonic. The perforations are large, but usually do not extend entirely through the pieces, having been made for inspection only. The powder of this has not the brownish tinge of that of the Chinese drug. [B. 180 (a, 35).]—Stick r. See under English r. (2d def.).—Taschkend r. A variety of Russian r. of inferior quality brought into Russia by way of Taschkend. RIB, n. Ri²²b. Gr., ῥιβός, ῥιβρόν. Lat., costa. Fr., côte. Ger., Rippe. 1. One of the long, flat curved bones with the concavity inward which extend ventrally from the vertebral column. Their anterior or ventral extremities are united in the thoracic region by means of the sternum and costal cartilages, and elsewhere are free. They constitute the pleurapophyses of a typical vertebra, and are usually confined to the dorsal and abdominal regions. The vertebral extremities, or heads, are somewhat thickened, and articulate with the bodies of two adjacent vertebrae. The articular surfaces usually being separated by the intervertebral ridges. On the lower margin, separated from the head by a slight constriction, the neck, is the tubercle, which articulates with the transverse process of the lower of the two vertebrae with which the r. articulates. Slightly anterior to the tubercle is the angle, at which point the bone curves more sharply. On the inner aspect of the lower border is a groove for the intercostal vessels and nerves. The anterior extremity is concave for the reception of the costal cartilage. Each r. is twisted upon itself, causing the vertical position behind to be oblique in front. In man the ribs are normally twelve in number on each side, seven true and five false. 2. A r. and its costal cartilage regarded as a unit. [L, 31, 142, 152, 332.] 3. lipsoid shape, marbled with reddish-brown spots and veins. These seeds (castor-seeds) contain an acrid, probably volatile, emetic, powerfully purgative principle, and yield castor-oil. In India, where this oil is extensively produced, there are two varieties of the plant, known respectively as R. communis fructibus majoribus and R. communis fructibus minoribus, and the latter is thought to furnish the better product. The oil of the large-seeded variety is said to have a heavy, unpleasant odor and a darker color and is used chiefly in veterinary practice and for burning. The oil of the small-seeded variety is used not only for the purposes referred to under castor-oil (q. v.), but in cutaneous and rectal diseases and as an anthelmintic. The leaves are used as a galactagogue, either applied to the breasts, or given internally; they are also used in skin diseases, abscesses, and ophthalmia. A decoction of the root is used in flatulent colic, for nephritic pains, and in asthma, and the root-bark is said to be powerfully purgative. The plant is cultivated in Germany for the production of silk, one species of silkworm (Bombyx Arrindii) requiring its leaves as food. [B, 175, 180, 185, 314 (a, 36).] Cf. From sάκχαρον, sugar, and μύκης, a fungus. A genus of non-chlorophyllaceous cryptogams forming a group—the Saccharomycetes, or Saccharomycetes (Fr., saccharomycètes; Ger., Hefepilze)—commonly known as the yeast-fungi, by some botanists regarded as degenerate forms of the Ascomycetes. They include most of the Fungi capable of exciting alcoholic fermentation in saccharine liquids, and are able to live without free oxygen. They consist of rounded or ellipsoidal, apparently non-nucleated cells, which, under suitable conditions, reproduce themselves by repeated processes of budding. [B. 121, 238, 291, 298, 316 (a, 35).]—S. albicans. See Oidium albicans.—S. apiculatus. A species composed of citron-shaped or oval cells, with short points at each end, rarely united into small, slightly branching colonies; it occurs, with other forms of yeast, on fermenting fruit and in other spontaneous fermentations. Formation by spores is unknown. [“Cribl. f. Bakteriell. und Parasitenk.” July 28, 1891, p. 100; B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—S. capillitii. A species with spherical conidia, usually from 2.5 to 5.8 μ in diameter, forming glomerules, and producing long, thin, hair-like buds. It is found on the human scalp and other hairy parts, and, according to Pekkellaring, is the probable cause of pityriasis capitis. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—S. cerevisiae. Ger., Hefepilz. The yeast of beer (or brandy), brewers' yeast. The cells are generally spherical or oval, between 8 and 9 μ in length, solitary or with branches composed of short chains. It also occurs in the fermentation of palm wine. In ordinary yeast, as in the high fermentation of beer, it is found at 18° C. of beer it forms, at the surface of the liquid, branched bands consisting of several buds; in low fermentation (between 4° C. and 10° C.) the yeast is deposited at the bottom of the vessel, the cells being mostly solitary or united in small numbers. If not fully immersed in the liquid, it passes into forms similar to molds, and, like the latter, lives on atmospheric oxygen. These aerobiotic forms, however, pass again into as if immersed in wort. [“Cribl. f. Bakt. u. Parasitenk.” May 23, 1891, p. 663; B. 77, 238, 291, 316 (a, 35).]—S. conglomerata. A species of a dirty-red color, observed by Spengazzini in northern Italy on decomposing human faeces, on which it forms a somewhat wax-like layer. The conidia are spherical, from 12 to 14 μ in length and 10 to 11 μ in breadth. They occur in very short chains, or solitary and increase (presumably by budding) by a tail-shaped appendage. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—S. ellipsoideus. The ferment of wine, wine-yeast; found in all spontaneous fermentations, especially that of wine-juice. The cells, elliptical and usually 6 μ in length, are solitary or united in small branching colonies. The asci are generally solitary, with from 2 to 4 spores. [“Cribl. f. Bakt. u. Parasitenk.” July 28, 1891, p. 100; B. 238, 291, 316 (a, 35).]—S. exiguus. A species occurring in the last stage of the fermentation of beer, forming conical or circular cells, 5 μ in length and 2.5 μ in thickness, in branching chains. The asci are solitary and contain 2 or 3 spores. [B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—S. galacticolus. A form occurring in the fermentation of milk. The cells, which are oval or elliptical and 4 to 8 μ by 3 to 5 μ , are at first solitary, but eventually form chains. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—S. glutinis. Pink torula; a species forming slimy rose-colored coatings on gelatin, potatoes, etc. The pigment is not affected by acids or alkalis. The cells, which are spherical, oval, elliptical, or in short cylinders, about 4 μ in breadth, 5 to 11 μ in length, solitary or joined in groups of two or more, are hyaline in the fresh state, but if dried and again moistened show a faintly reddish nucleus. Development by sporification has never been observed. [B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—S. guttulatus. A form occurring in the digestive tract of mammals, birds, and reptiles. The cells are elliptical or oblong-ovate, 15 to 24 μ by 5 to 8 μ in size, of a deep-brown color, and opaque, and contain from 2 to 4 hyaline droplets. Growth by spore, forming very branching chains, occurring on fermenting liquids, as a scum known as vinegar ferment or flowers of beer (or wine), though, according to Nägeli and others, it is not the cause of acetic fermentation (see Bacterium aceti). It is found on fermenting wine, especially if poor in alcohol, on beer (see under MYCODERMA of beer), on fruit-juices, and on sauerkraut. The asci attain a length of 30 μ and contain each from 1 to 4 spores. Some identify it with the Oidi-

SACCHAROSE. n. $\text{Sa}^2\text{k}^2\text{-a}^2\text{-os}$. Fr., s. Ger., S. A carbohydrate, $\text{C}_{12}\text{H}_{22}\text{O}_{11}$, derived in large quantities from Saccharum officinarum, Sorghum saccharatum, Beta vulgaris, Acer saccharinum, and the stalks of Indian corn. In small quantities it is found in the juices of many fruits, grasses, roots, and flowers. It occurs either as large transparent prismatic crystals (rock-candy, sugar-candy), as small, white, prismatic, crystalline granules, or as an amorphous vitreous mass (barley-sugar). It has an agreeable, very sweet taste, and is completely soluble in water, only slightly soluble in alcohol, insoluble in ether. It melts at 160° C., at 200° C. is converted into caramel, and at a higher temperature decomposes into various volatile empyreumatic principles and carbon. Its aqueous solution has a specific dextrorotatory power of 73°. In chemical structure, s. is a doubly tetrameric or an octacetic alcohol, and at the same time a double aldehyde. It stands in the same relation to the carbohydrates of the formula $\text{C}_6\text{H}_{12}\text{O}_6$ (glucoses) that ether does to alcohol. The term is also applied generally to all carbohydrates of the formula $\text{C}_{12}\text{H}_{22}\text{O}_{11}$. [B. 4, 9.]

The spherical or somewhat oval cocci, which average 2.5 μ in size, are united in small cubical groups of eight, rounded at the corners, and are bound together to form larger packets. Some authors identify this with S. lutea, but, unlike the latter, its gelatin and potato cultivations show spherical cocci, diplococci, and tetrads, instead of the packets characteristic of the genus. In cultivations in hay infusions, however, the cubical arrangement is well marked. [a, 35.]—S. Virchowii. SCAMMONY, n. Ska'm'on'i. Gr., σκαμνώνια. Lat., scammonia, scammonia, scammonium [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Dan. Ph., Ger. Ph., Swiss Ph., Hung. Ph. (1st ed.), Norw. Ph., Swed. Ph.] (halepense [Pruss. Ph., 6th ed.]), resina scammonium, gummi scammonii. Fr., scammonée (d'Alep) [Fr. Cod.], scammonée de Syrie. Ger., Scammonium, Skammonie. Sp., escamonea [Sp. Ph.]. A gum-resin obtained by incision from the root of Convolvulus scammonia. The pure product, dried by exposure to sun and air, is a transparent, brittle substance, breaking with a vitreous, shining fracture. In the fragment it is pale yellowish-brown, and in powder of a light-buff color. It yields by treatment with ether over 88 per cent. of soluble matter, the residuum being almost colorless. If not kept quite dry, it usually becomes moldy, and in course of time develops at the surface a white, crystalline, cauliflower-like efflorescence the chemical nature of which is not known. Most of the s. of the U. S. markets is in circular cakes, 6 inches or less in diameter, and from ¼ to 1 inch or more thick in the centre, dark olive or dark ash externally, and lighter internally. When fractured, it exhibits usually a finely porous structure. It has a peculiar cheesy smell, and a taste which, though slight at first, leaves a bitter, acrid sensation. When triturated with water, it gives to the latter a greenish, milky appearance. S. has cathartic properties, due to the presence of jalapin. As its tendency is to gripe, it is usually given with other cathartics, or in emulsion with mucilage, almonds, or some other demulcent. It was used by the ancient Greeks and Arabians not only as a purgative, but externally in various skin diseases. [B, 5, 18, 180 (a, 35).]—Aleppo s. Lat., scammonium halepense [Pruss. Ph., 6th ed.] (see aleppicum). Fr., scammonée d'Alep [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., aleppisches Scammonium, Scammonium von Aleppo. S. shipped from Aleppo; a name formerly given to very pure sorts of s. from that port. To day, at least in the United States, the term is applied to s. of various qualities shipped from Smyrna. [a, 35.]—Facititious s. See Montpellier s. and under Smyrna s.—French s. See Montpellier s.—Lacrima s. The pure drug as prepared near Smyrna by mixing shell s. with the partially dried drops of juice remaining on the cut surface of the root and with a calcareous earth. It occurs in irregular lumps of a porous or bubbly structure, owing to the fermentation of the s. juice from long exposure to heat and its retention in a liquid condition. [a, 35.]—Montpellier s. Lat., scammonium montepelliacum (see montepelliacum, see gallicum). Fr., scammonée de Montpellier (ou en galettes). Ger., französisches Scammonium, Scammonium von Montpellier. French s.; a facititious s. prepared from the expressed juice of a plant (Cynanchum montepelliacum, according to Guibourt) and various resins and purgatives. It is found usually in flat, semicircular cakes, blackish internally as well as externally, of a very bitter, nauseous taste and a feeble balsamic smell, not at all like that of real s. When rubbed with the moistened finger, instead of forming a white emulsion like s., it becomes dark-gray, unctuous, and tenacious. [B, 5, 180 (a, 35).] Cf. Smyrna s.—Resin of s. Lat., resina scammonæ [Fr. Cod.] (see scammonia) [Belg. Ph., Ger. Ph. (1st ed.), Netherl. Ph., Russ. Ph., Swiss Ph.], see scammonii [U. S. Ph., Swed. Ph.], scammonia resina [Br. Ph.], Fr., résine de scammonée [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., Scammoniumharz. A brown, resinous substance, of little or no taste and smell, extracted from s. [U. S. Ph., Fr. Cod., Swed. Ph.], from s.-root [Ger. Ph., Belg. Ph., Swiss Ph., Netherl. Ph., Russ. Ph.], or from either [Br. Ph.] with alcohol. The resin is freely soluble in ether, and does not form an emulsion with water. [B, 5, 18, 95 (a, 35, 38).]—S.-root. Lat., scammonia [Br. Ph., Netherl. Ph.], scammonie radix [Br. Ph., Netherl. Ph.], radix scammonie [Belg. Ph., Ger. Ph. (1st ed.), Russ. Ph.], Sp., escamonea (raíz) [Sp. Ph.]. The dried root of Convolvulus scammonia. [B, 5, 18 (a, 35).]—Shell s. Ger., Scammonium in Schalen. Scammony s. allowed to dry in the mussel-shells in which it was received from the incised root; now rarely, if ever, found in commerce. [a, 35.]—Smyrna s. Lat., scammonium smyrnæum (see de Smyrna). Fr., scammonée de Smyrne. Ger., smyrnisches Scammonium. The name formerly given to inferior varieties of s. shipped from Smyrna. At present the term is applied in the United States to spurious s., including Montpellier s. [a, 35.]—Virgin s. Pures. Most of the s. occurring in commerce under this name is, however, more or less adulterated, the pure resin varying from 25 to 80 per cent. [a, 35.]

SELENIUM (Lat., n. n. Se'l'e-nan'(i)2-u'sm(u'm). From σεληνη, the moon. Fr., sélénium. Ger., Selen. A non-metallic element discovered by Berzelius in 1817. It occurs in nature in combination with sulphur and with metals in many minerals. Ordinary, or soluble, s. is either a bright-red powder or a black micro-crystalline powder, soluble in carbon disulphide, and crystallizing from its solution in dark-red monoclinic crystals. When melted and quickly cooled it forms a dark-colored, translucent, vitreous, brittle substance. When melted, cooled to 210° C., and maintained at this temperature for some time, soluble s. is transformed into so-called metallic s., or insoluble s., a granular, crystalline mass, insoluble in carbon disulphide. S., when sublimed, gives off a dark-red vapor, which condenses into the so-called scarlet flowers of s. In composition s. is usually bivalent, replacing two atoms of hydrogen, but acts as a quadrivalent or sexvalent radicle. In the formation of its compounds it presents a strong analogy with sulphur. Symbol, Se; atomic weight, 79. [B. 3.]—S. bromide. See S. monobromide and S. tetrabromide.—S. chloride. glischer Senf (oder Senfsamen [2d def.]). 1. White (or salad) mustard (plant), charlock; a species indigenous probably to the more southern parts of Europe and to western Asia. The yellowish seeds, larger than black-mustard seeds and having a testa which contains a mucilaginous substance, have a composition like that of black mustard, but in place of sinigrin contain sinalbin, which in presence of water is acted on by the myrosin (in which they are richer than black mustard-seed) and splits up into acrinyl sulphocyanate, sinapine sulphate, and sugar. Hence white mustard yields no volatile oil. It is, however, a powerful rubefacient, and is usually employed in the form of the flower mixed with that of black mustard. 2. Of the U. S. Ph., the seed of S. alba (1st def.). [a, 35].—S. arvensis. Fr., moutarde sauvage (ou des champs), jottée, navette des sévins, rosse, russe, sauve, sendre. Ger., Ackersenf, Feldsenf, falscher Federich, Corn, wild mustard, charlock, field mustard, white kale, kedlock, kerlock; a European weed naturalized in the United States. The large black seeds, formerly official as semen rapistræ arvorum, are pungent and diuretic. [a, 35].—S. glauca. A species cultivated in the East Indies for the rubefacient oil derived from the seeds, which are used like black mustard-seed. The leaves are eaten. [a, 35].—S. juncea. See BRASSICA juncea.—S. nigra. Fr., moutarde noire [Fr. Cod.], semence de moutarde [Fr. Cod.] (2d def.). Ger., Senfkohl (1st def.), schwarzer Senf (oder Senfsamen) (2d def.). Sp., mostaza [Mex. Ph.] (2d def.). 1. Black (or brown, or red) mustard (plant), the váru of Theophrastus and sivani of Dioscorides; an herb growing spontaneously over a large part of the Old World and naturalized now in both North and South America. It bears numerous smooth, erect pods containing spherical or slightly oval, minutely pitted, blackish seeds, and a myrosin, brown, pungent seeds. These seeds, the s. nigra of the U. S. Ph., or black mustard, contain cellulose, sulphur, nitrogen, albuminoids, etc., and over 20 per cent. of a greenish-yellow fixed oil consisting of the glycerin compounds of stearic, oleic, and erucic acids. They also yield by distillation with water mustard-oil (2d def.), which does not, however, pre-exist in the seeds, but is developed by the action of water on the albuminoid compounds, blackish and myrosin, the latter, an albuminoid ferment, splitting up the sinigrin into the essential oil, a potassium salt, and sugar. Black mustard is chiefly used as a rubefacient in sinapisms. The flour is often used as an emetic, especially in narcotic poisoning. The volatile oil is also a powerful rubefacient. It has been used internally in colic, but in overdoses is a dangerous poison. 2. Of the U. S. Ph., black (or brown, or red) mustard (seed), the seeds of S. nigra. [a, 35].—S. nigra semina, S. (semina). See S. nigra (2d def.).—Spiritus s. Ger., Senfspiritus. Sp., alcohol de mostaza [Sp. Ph.]. A clear, colorless solution of 2 parts of mustard-oil in 98 of alcohol of sp. gr. 0.832 [Ger. Ph., Finn. Ph., Swed. Ph., Swiss Ph.] (80-per-cent. alcohol [Belg. Ph.], or in 48 [Russ. Ph.] 100 [Aust. Ph., Hung. Ph., Roum. Ph., Sp. Ph.]) of 90-per-cent. alcohol. [a, 38].

SOAP, n. Sop. Gr. σάπων. Lat. sapo. Fr. savon. Ger. Seife. It, sapon, s. p. jabón. A substance prepared by the action of a caustic alkali or a metallic salt on animal or vegetable fats and oils, and consisting essentially of a compound of a metal with one or more fatty acids or with acids of the oleic-acid group. This chemical action, known as saponification, is essentially a double decomposition by which the metal of the caustic alkali or metallic salt combines with the acid radicle present in the fat operated on, while the glyceryl which forms the other component of the fat combines with hydrogen and oxygen to form glycerin: $C_{17}H_{35}O_2 + 3KOH = C_{17}H_{33}O_2 + 3C_3H_7O_2$.

Tristearin. Caustic potash. Glycerin. Potassium stearate.
 $C_{18}H_{37}O_2(C_{18}H_{35}O_2)_2 + 3KOH = C_{18}H_{35}O_2 + 3C_3H_7O_2$.

SODA (Lat.), n. f. Sod'a. Fr. soude (caustique [1st def.]). Ger. S. Sode, Natron, Aetznatron (1st def.). 1. Caustic s., sodium hydroxide; a hard, white or grayish, opaque solid, of fibrous texture, melting just below a red heat, deliquescent in moist air, efflorescent in dry air, and very soluble in alcohol, less soluble in water. It is a strongly alkaline base, of very acid and caustic taste. From its great affinity for water, it acts as a caustic, but is less effective in its action than caustic potash. 2. A name applied to various salts of sodium (especially sodium carbonate or bicarbonate) formerly considered as compounds of sodium oxide with water or with acid radicles. The term is now usually restricted to the salts of sodium occurring native or used in commerce. When used without qualification, caustic s. is generally understood. [B. 5.] 3. more prisms, and a telescope. The collimator is a narrow vertical slit formed by the adjustment of two metallic jaws at the principal focus of a convex lens which so condenses the divergent rays of light received through the slit as to cause them to enter the prisms as a beam. This prism, or series of prisms, is so arranged that the edges are parallel to the slit; and thus a spectrum is produced which it is the function of the telescope to magnify. [a, 49.]—Direct-vision s. A s. made by combining prisms of crown glass with one or more of flint glass. The edges of the prisms of crown and of flint glass are in opposite directions. The dispersion is given by the flint and the refraction is overcome by the crown glass prisms, so that the spectrum appears directly in the line of the source of light, instead of being bent as with a single prism. Used largely in the formation of spectral oculars or microspectroscopes. [J.]

SPECTRUM (Lat.), n. n. Spe'kt/'ru'm(ru'm). From specere, to look at. Fr., spectre. Ger., S. 1. A band consisting of a definite succession of colors into which a beam of white light is decomposed when it is passed through a prism or a diffraction grating. Its formation depends on the principle that the different-colored rays of which a ray of white light is composed are unequally refrangible and hence, on undergoing refraction, occupy different positions and are no longer blended together. Their order, beginning with the less refrangible, is red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. [B, 2.] Of any specific substance, its absorption s. [a, 48.]—Absorption s. A s. crossed with dark bands produced by the specific absorptive action of gases, liquids, or solutions of solids or translucent or transparent colored solids, such as monazite, on a beam of white light made to pass through them before falling upon the prism or other refracting medium. The position of the bands, which are called absorption bands, is constant for the same substance, but the breadth and definition of the bands depend to some extent on the degree of concentration of the absorbing medium. [B, J.]—Continuous s. A s. uninterrupted by dark or bright lines crossing it. [B.]—Diffraction s., Grating s. Ger., Gitterspectrum. A s. produced by passing light through a grating (q. v., 3d def.). [B.]—Solar s. Fr., spectre solaire. Ger., Sonnenspectrum. The s. afforded by the refraction of a beam of sunlight. Under ordinary circumstances this is continuous, but when solar light is passed through a fine slit the s. is crossed by numerous dark lines called Fraunhofer's lines. [B.]

SPECULARIA (Lat.), n. f. Spe'k-u'²(u¹)-a(a²)/ri²-a². From speculum (q. v.). Fr., spéculaires. Ger., Spiegelglöcke. A genus of the Croc. speciosa. [a, 35.]—S. speciosa. A genus of the Vénus, doucette, mirette. Ger., Ackernole, Venuspiegel. Lady's (or Venus's) looking-glass; an astrinient species rarely used. The young shoots and the roots are eaten. [a, 35.]

the great majority of cases it is only after one or more s's have fused with an ovum that segmentation and the development of an embryo take place. In all cases a s. is supposed to be the equivalent of a cell. In man and most of the higher animals s's appear in shape and action like minute tadpoles. The head represents the nucleus of the cell, and a delicate layer of protoplasm enveloping the head, together with the tail, represents the cell-body. In some cases there is seen a thickening in the tail at its junction with the head, and also in some cases the tail and middle piece are bordered by a kind of frill. In the inferior animals the s's are of very various form, some being hair-like, as in insects, while others are cell-like. In most cases the tail has a continuous lashing or cilia-like motion, but in the two groups in which the s's are cell-like (nema-toids and crustaceans) they exhibit amoeboid movement. [J, 1, 80, 85.] 2. In cryptogams, a male motile cell (gamete) developed in the antheridium, occurring in most cases as a more or less spiral filament provided at its smaller end with two or more lash-like appendages (cilia) by means of which, under suitable conditions of moisture, it is propelled from the antheridium and, entering the archegonium or oogonium, fuses with the contained oosphere and forms the oospore. The term is also applied, but less correctly, to a non-motile, unciliated antherozoid (see SPERMATUM). [B, 19, 77, 121, 229, 291 (a, 35).]

Ger., Kommabacillus. The comma bacillus (see Plate iii, Fig. 16); a species regarded as the causal agent of Asiatic cholera on account of its constant presence in that disease and its absence in other diseases and in health. It is found in the dejecta and intestinal contents, and, according to Nicati and Rietsch, sometimes in the bile-ducts and gall-bladder, but it never occurs in the other organs or in the blood. It has been observed in small numbers on several occasions in the vomit of cholera, but Flüge suggests that in these cases the vomited matter may have been the intestinal contents which had passed into the stomach. The bacilli are usually minute, and curved like a comma, though at times (as almost always in drop cultivations) they form by the continuous adhesion of the individual bacilli long screw-like filaments. These fragments, or individual bacilli, which vary in length from $\frac{1}{10}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ μ (averaging about $1\frac{1}{2}$ μ) and have a thickness of from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ their length, are in their youngest state slightly curved or straight, and when more fully developed distinctly curved, sometimes showing a full half-circle. They are usually very active, shooting forward or turning round their axis. The longer spirilla have a slower and more oscillating motion. Under various conditions, as on moist linen or moist earth, they multiply very rapidly. Spore-formation has never been observed with certainty. The s. liquefies gelatin slowly, both in punctures and on plates. It punctures it forms a thin tube, funnel-shaped toward the surface of the gelatin, where it has a diameter after 48 hours of about $\frac{1}{4}$ cm. The funnel contains liquid the level of which is often lower than the surface of the gelatin. It is not till after from 4 to 6 days that the liquefaction has extended to the margin of the glass at the surface of the gelatin. On the plates it forms after 24 hours at 22° C. very minute white points which appear under a low power of the microscope as small, round, whitish-yellow discs which are so refracting that the surface of the plates seem as if sprinkled with bits of glass. These discs, which have an irregular, wavy, not sharply defined margin, become gradually larger, and retain their color, except that the central point becomes somewhat darker. They form, on liquefying the gelatin, funnels containing fluid, the colonies lying at the bottom of the funnels. After 48 hours' growth at 22° C. these funnels measure hardly 1 mm. in diameter at the surface. On the surface of agar-agar the bacillus forms a grayish-yellow, gelatinous, folded coating without liquefying the substratum. Unlike the S. Finkler-Prior, it does not grow at all on potatoes at ordinary temperatures, and at higher temperatures forms only a slight, brownish mucous coating. The organisms develop in large numbers in blood-serum, neutralized meat infusion, and milk, the milk not being sensibly altered in character. According to Flüge, in none of the cultivations is there any development of putrefactive gases or foul odor. Buchner asserts, however, that a foul smell was observable in his cultivations of the bacilli in meat infusions. As the bacilli are sensitive to acids, the nutrient jelly, meat infusions, etc., must be slightly alkaline or accurately neutralized. Though the bacilli develop best when in contact with the oxygen of the air, they grow even where that gas is absent, if other conditions are favorable. No growth occurs below a temperature of 16° C., and at 17° C. only a slight growth (Koch). The gelatin cultivations are usually made between 22° C. and 25° C.; between 30° C. and 40° C. the gelatin is completely liquefied. The bacilli are more sensitive to drying than almost any other bacteria, dying in from 2 to 3 hours at the ordinary temperature if spread out in the air on a cover-glass. Hence infection through the air is impossible, unless perhaps in the exceptional cases where bubbles, detached by agitation from infective fluids, might be carried for short distances by currents of air. The presence of saprophytic bacteria, especially when in excess or when the conditions as regards nutrition, temperature, etc., are unfavorable to the comma bacilli, leads rapidly to the death of the latter. According to Koch, if added to sewage, they can not be found after 24 hours, and in impure water they are said to die in 6 or 7 days except when in very large numbers. They will live even at -10° C.: boiling the fluid containing them, or exposing them for half an hour to a temperature of 60° C., causes their destruction. Alcohol, iron sulphate, hydrochloric acid, and quinine check their development; mercury bichloride and carbolic acid are most effectual in killing them. Natural infection of animals is unknown, and experiments made on them by the usual methods have shown no certain pathogenic action. Rietsch, Koch, and other experimenters have, however, caused the death of guinea-pigs with symptoms of cholera by injections of pure cultivations into the intestinal canal after having caused hyperæmia of the intestine and alteration of peristaltic action; and Koch produced similar results in guinea-pigs by first neutralizing the gastric juice with soda and slowing peristaltic movements with opium or alcohol, and then administering pure cultivations by the mouth. In some cases he used, instead of the pure cultivations, the intestinal contents of animals which had been infected and died. There is a case on record in which a physician was taken sick with cholera under circumstances which seemed to preclude all sources of infection other than the pure cultivations of the bacilli upon which he had been working. The virulence is said to be somewhat decreased if the cultivation is carried on for a long time in meat infusion or nutrient jelly kept at from 20° to 25° C. No inoculations with such bacilli, however, have been shown to be protective. [a. 35.]—S. Cohnii, S. dentium. The spirochæte of the saliva; very thin, wavy threads, 10 to 30 μ long, pointed at the extremities, occurring, along with Leptothrix buccalis, in the contents of carious teeth and in the deposit on the teeth. [a. 35.]—S. Finkler-Prior. A species obtained by Finkler and Prior from the dejecta of patients with cholera nostras, resembling S. cholerae asiaticæ, but presenting many differences in its mode of development, especially on potatoes, on which it forms within forty-eight hours, at the temperature of the room, a grayish-yellow coating marked by a white border from the substance of the potato. Further, the curved bacilli are somewhat thicker and longer than the cholera bacilli, and show less regularity in their thickness, being often somewhat pointed at their ends and thicker in the middle. In nutrient substrata containing sugar fermentation occurs with the formation of acid, and in all the cultivations a rather foul odor is developed. According to Buchner, it shows a marked tendency to change its form if the condition of the medium is not favorable; for instance, in gelatin to which 5 per cent. of sugar or 2 per cent. of glycerin has been added it sometimes forms spindles, sometimes sphaeres, and sometimes monad-bodies. As this organism has been found in other situations than the dejecta of cholera nostras (by Miller in a hollow tooth), as it was found by Finkler and Prior only in dejecta that had been kept so long as to undergo putrefaction, as other observers have not found it in the dejecta of cholera nostras at all, and as the experiments with the cultivations on animals show pathogenic action only under complex conditions, and then but rarely, it is probably saprophytic only. [a. 35.]—S. leucomelanum. A rare form of s. having alternating light and dark spaces. It is found in water over decaying Algae. [A. 396 (a. 21).]—S. Obermeieri. The Spirochæte Obermeieri (see Plate iii, Fig. 18); flexible, colorless threads between 16 and 40 μ long, found in the blood of patients with relapsing fever. It occurs only during the febrile attacks, and is never found in the secretions and evacuations. The threads are not more than $\frac{1}{1000}$ of an inch thick, have from 10 to 20 convolutions, and when fresh exhibit active movements, partly unfolding and becoming wavy throughout their entire length. They resist the action of concentrated acetic acid, and are readily stained by certain dyes, such as fuchsin and alkaline methylene blue. Relapsing fever has been produced in man by accidental inoculations from cuts during autopsies; and Koch and Carter inoculated monkeys with the disease (though without true relapses) with human defibrinated blood containing the spirilla, the blood of the animals showing during the febrile attack large numbers of the spirilla. The monkeys were not protected from a recurrence of the disease by one attack. The fever could not be set up by inoculations with blood not containing the spirilla in a living state. [a. 35.]—S. plicatilis, S. portæ. A very active organism found in stagnant water, consisting of thin bacilli from 110 to 225 μ long, with many narrow turns, forming in most cases a double wavy line. The primary turns are equal in size, the secondary often unequal.—S. rosaceum. A species forming a red coloring matter; found in excrement that has been kept in water. [A. 396 (a. 21).]—S. Rosenbergl. A species consisting of filaments from 4 to 12 μ long with granules of sulphur, found in brackish water. [A. 396 (a. 21).]—S. rugula. See VIBRIO rugula.—S. sanguineum. A species found in brackish, putrescent water; consisting of cylindrical bacilli, rounded at the apex, uniflagellate, 3 μ or more in width, varying in length, usually with 2 turns; its plasma is of a purplish color, and contains numerous granules of sulphur. Zopf refers it to the genus Beggiatoa. [a. 35.]—S. serpens. Syn.: Vibrio serpens. A species occurring, often in dense masses, in stagnant water and various infusions; rapidly moving filaments 0.8 to 1.1 μ thick, 11 to 28 μ long, with 3 or 4 regular permanent turns, and not rarely united in chains. [a. 35.]—S. tenue. An exceedingly active form often occurring in heaps or zooglicæ masses in marsh water, decoctions of plants, and putrid infusions; very thin threads 4 to 15 μ long, with 2 to 5 turns. [a. 35.]—S. tyroenum. Ger., Käsespirille. A species obtained by Deneké from very old cheese, resembling S. cholerae asiaticæ, but with smaller individual bacilli and often smaller screws and somewhat narrower turns in the threads. Moreover, it liquefies gelatin more energetically. It forms in 24 hours of gelatin plates small, white, punctiform colonies appearing under a low power of the microscope as dark greenish-brown discs with sharp outlines which disappear as the gelatin begins to liquefy, the margins becoming lighter and the centre of the discs assuming a dark-yellow color. On agar-agar it forms a yellowish-white layer, but does not develop at all on potatoes. From experiments on animals, the organism is regarded as purely saprophytic. [a. 35.]—S. undula. Syn.: Vibrio undula (see proflifer). A very common organism in putrefying liquids, consisting of threads 1 to 15 μ thick and 8 to 16 μ long [Saccardo], 11 to 14 μ by 8 to 12 μ [Flüge] exhibiting "rapid simultaneously turning and twisting movements." Each thread makes from 14 to 8 or 4 turns. The flagella are long and slightly arched, becoming thinner toward their ends. [a. 35.]—S. volutans. A species found in marsh or stagnant water and in a decoction of dead fresh-water snails; threads, sometimes motile, sometimes non-motile, 1.5 to 2 μ thick, 25 to 30 μ long, with 24 to 34 turns, and with a distinct flagellum at each end. The threads contain a dark granular matter. [A. 35.]

A soft, vascular organ, usually classed among the ductless glands, about five inches in length, four in breadth, and an inch in thickness and somewhat flattened or concavo-convex when removed from the body. When in situ it is concavo-convex and embraces the cardia. Its internal and concave side contains a vertical fissure (the hilum) through which the splenic vessels and nerves pass. It lies between the stomach and the diaphragm. The peritoneum covers it externally except where it is reflected to the stomach and diaphragm. Beneath the peritoneum is a layer of fibrous tissue which surrounds the splenic vessels and sends numerous processes within the organ, forming a supporting framework including the Malpighian corpuscles and true splenic tissue. To it has been ascribed the formation of the red and white blood-corpuscles and of a ferment which plays a part in pancreatic digestion. [L, 31, 142, 172, 333.] 2. Anger, hypochondriasis; melancholy. [E, 2.]—Thomas's s. for hip-joint disease. A s. made long enough to extend from the middle of the posterior surface of the leg to the middle of the trunk. It consists of thin sheet-steel 1 inch wide and $\frac{3}{4}$ inch thick, and is bent so as to rest close up against the tuber ischi, beneath the nates. On it are placed two semicircular strips of strap-iron, the one on the thigh part of the iron and the other on the leg part. These may be slid up or down. Two short segments of metal are also connected to the upper end of the s., and are designed to embrace half the circumference of the body. A shoe with a cork sole 24 or 3 inches high, designed for the foot of the sound limb, is also required. The patient stands on the sound limb, with a block placed beneath the foot of the affected limb, high enough to correct the obliquity of the pelvis and the inclination of the spine. The s. is next placed along the posterior surface of the leg, the thigh, the buttock, and the back, and bent so as to conform exactly to the outlines of these parts. A plain roller is then applied around the limb, beginning at the middle of the leg and continuing it up to the groin, from which point it is passed to the body, and ended by a few circular turns beginning about the crests of the ilia and terminating at the lower angle of the scapula. For this roller, which is merely a protective for the skin, one leg of a pair of woolen drawers may be substituted. A plaster roller-bandage is next applied around the limb at the middle of the leg, at the knee, and around the thigh a short distance below the buttock; after which the plaster bandage is made to encircle the body as high as the lower angle of the scapula, care being taken to protect the crests of the ilia. The s. is next placed in position along the posterior aspect of the leg, thigh, and buttock, and is secured by a second and third plaster roller following the same order as the first. After the plaster has hardened it may either be left undivided or split up along the anterior surface and secured by straps. Of Escherich, an aerobic, liquefying micrococcus from 0.8 to 1.2 μ in diameter, occasionally oval in form and 3 μ in its long diameter, found associated in irregular groups; occasionally found in the alvine discharges of healthy infants. [a, 34.]—S. Biskrae. Fr., microbe du bouton de Biskra. The micrococcus of Biskra button, in which disease it is found in the blood, pustules, etc. It is closely related to S. pyogenes aureus, but it liquefies gelatin much more slowly; its colonies, moreover, on agar-agar are whitish and raised, and on potatoes are of an orange-red color. [a, 35.]—S. candidus. A species found by Warrington in milk, in which it forms so small a quantity of acid that the milk does not coagulate after boiling. The cocci are glistening white, and are associated in the irregular groups peculiar to the genus. [a, 35.]—S. cereus (albus). A non-pathogenic species forming cocci 1.6 μ in diameter. On gelatin plates, which it does not liquefy, it produces white points that eventually attain a size of from 1 to 2 mm. In stroke cultivation it forms a white, wax-like layer with irregular, somewhat thickened borders, and on potatoes a grayish-white layer of medium thickness. The micro-organism was found by Passet in pus, but experiments on animals show it to possess no pyogenic properties. [a, 35.]—S. cereus flavus. See S. Passetii.—S. epidermidis albus. Biskrae* found by Leloir in circumfollicular dermatitis. [B, 316 (a, 34).]—S. Passetii. A non-pathogenic organism occurring as diplococci about 1 μ long, found in pus. It forms on gelatin plates (without liquefying them) prominent, intensely yellow droplets. [a, 35.]—S. pyogenes. A species including as varieties, according to Saccardo, S. pyogenes albus, S. pyogenes citreus, and S. flavescens. [a, 35.] See Plate III, Fig. 10.—S. pyogenes albus. As S. found in pus, along with S. pyogenes aureus, from which it differs only in the absence of pigment, the colonies remaining white even after a long time. According to Flüge, this variety occurs more frequently in rabbits and other animals than S. pyogenes aureus. [a, 35.]—S. pyogenes aureus. Fr., staphylococque doré. The most common of the pyogenic microbes, being found in acute abscesses, empyema, boils, acute osteomyelitis, pyæmia, ulcerative endo-carditis, etc. It occurs as isodiametric cells about 0.84 μ (Saccardo) or 0.87 μ (Passet) in diameter, often as diplococci, usually grouped in irregular masses. On agar-agar it forms yellowish colonies undulated at the margins, and on gelatin plates punctiform colonies which appear at first, under a low power of the microscope, as light-brown balls having a dark centre and smooth borders. When the colonies reach the surface of the gelatin (after 2 or 3 days), they assume a yellow color and, slowly liquefying the gelatin, form circular depressions, which finally coalesce. The yellow pigment occurs only when the colonies are in contact with the air, the cultivations under a layer of oil remaining white. The puncture in nutrient jelly produces comparatively rapid liquefaction with the deposition of the colonies in the form of a golden-yellow sediment. Inoculated into milk, it curdles the latter after 1 to 8 days by the production of lactic and other acids. This S. is remarkable for its great resistance to external agents, the cultivations remaining active after more than a year. [a, 35.]—S. pyogenes citreus. A variety occurring in the pus of acute abscesses, differing from S. pyogenes aureus only in the bright, citron-yellow pigment. [a, 35.]—S. pyosepticus. Of Héricourt and Richet, a variety found in an epithelial non-ulcerated swelling on a recently killed dog. It closely resembles S. pyogenes albus. [“N. Y. Med. Jour.,” July 6, 1889, p. 14 (a, 50).]—S. salivarius pyogenes, S. sialopyus. A species occurring as diplococci 0.3 to 0.5 μ long in the contents of an abscess of a guinea-pig inoculated with the saliva from a man with angina scarlatina. On gelatin plates, which it liquefies slowly, it forms, especially in the lowest strata, sharply defined rounded colonies of a whitish, opalescent appearance. [a, 35.]—S. viridiflavescens. A non-pathogenic species found in varicella. It forms on gelatin plates, which it does not liquefy, greenish-yellow, circular, smooth-edged colonies, and on blood-serum lemon-yellow colonies. [E.]

STARCHE, n. Staʹrch. Gr., ἀμύλον. Lat., amylum. Fr., amidon, fécule blanche (ou amylacée). Ger., Stärke, Stärke-mehl. It., amido. Sp., almidon. A carbohydrate having the chemical constitution $C_6H_{12}O_5$, or some multiple of this formula ($C_{12}H_{24}O_{10}$, $C_3H_6O_2$, and $C_6H_{12}O_5$ have been given, and $C_6H_{12}O_5$ for dried s.); according to Salomon, however, the simple formula $C_6H_{12}O_5$ represents its composition most nearly. S. is contained in nearly all chlorophyllaceous plants, being derived from the protoplasm of the chlorophyll corpuscles and from small protoplasmic bodies called s-formers. It is stored up in the tubers, roots, seeds, etc., forming a nutriment for the young shoot. It is also found in other rapidly growing parts. S. is a white, shining, tasteless, and colorless powder, which, under the microscope, is seen to be made up of striated granules, differing in size, shape, and markings according to the source from which the s. is derived. The diameter of these granules ranges from 2 to 185 μ . Each granule consists of a series of concentric layers disposed about an eccentrically situated nucleus, called the hilum, the layers being separated from each other, according to some authorities, by concentric septa. S. granules have the property of polarizing light, and under polarized light show a dark cross, with arms intersecting the hilum. Chemically, s. consists of several isomeric substances differing in their solubility in water and their reaction toward iodine. The outer wall of each granule and the concentric septa found, according to some, in its interior are made up of amylose or s-cellulose (farinose), which is insoluble in water but soluble in caustic potash, and gives a yellowish or brownish coloration with iodine. The interior of the granule consists of a soluble s. (see AMYLUM [2d def.]). Between this soluble s. and s-cellulose various intermediate isomeric substances exist, which give yellow, violet, and red colorations with iodine. On boiling with water, the s-granules burst, and the contents swell up into a gelatinous paste (cf. Mucilago AMYL.), which on drying changes to a stiff transparent mass. On long boiling, or by prolonged exposure to a heat of 100° C. in the dry state, or by the action of diastase and chemical agents, s. is converted into a modification soluble in cold water (soluble s.). By the continued action of diastase and chemical agents, or by a dry heat of 320° C., s. is converted into dextrin. By the action of dilute nitric acid it forms xylodrin. With solutions of iodine, s. in all its forms gives a deep-blue color, which disappears on heating, but reappears on cooling. Iodine in substance converts s. into a compound (iodized s.) soluble in water, and from this solution a neutral salt precipitates the iodide of s. S. is obtained from the grains of the cereals, from the tubers of the potato, from the pith of the sago-palm (sago), from different species of Moranta (arrowroot), and from the Jatropha manihot (apiococa). It also enters largely into the composition of peas and beans, chestnuts, acorns, and other nuts, and the various edible rhizomes and tuberous roots. [B, 3, 5, 8, 9; L, 165.]—Animals.
